

College in Tinsukia starts 'earn while you learn' concept

CORRESPONDENT

DOOMDOOMA, June 11: In a groundbreaking initiative, Wim Colours and Cutting, Knitting Dress Making Centre at Women's College, Tinsukia, has embarked on a mission to stitch uniforms for the students of the college. This initiative not only aims to provide high-quality uniforms at a reasonable price but also promotes the empowering concept of 'earn while you learn.'

Under the expert guidance of Mamoni Singha, instructor of the centre, this programme has garnered widespread attention and praise. Singha, an alumna of Women's College, Tinsukia, has seamlessly integrated her professional expertise and personal commitment to her alma mater into this innovative project. Her leadership has been instrumental in steering the students towards achieving both economic independence and development of practical skills.

Another dedicated participant of this venture is Kaberi Namasudra, a student of Women's College, Tinsukia. Kaberi's active involvement in the uniform-stitching process vividly illustrates the initiative's empowering effect on students. Her participation exemplifies the programme's collaborative and inclusive nature, demonstrating how students can immediately apply and benefit from the skills they are currently acquiring.

The uniforms, meticulously crafted by the students, are a testament to their craftsmanship and dedication. This initiative is noteworthy for its dual purpose: providing affordable uniforms to students and simultaneously offering participants a hands-on learning experience.

Through their involvement in this project, students are gaining invaluable experience in garment making, a skill that can significantly enhance their future career prospects.

One of the unique aspects of this initiative is its focus on making the uniforms affordable without compromising on quality. The cost-effectiveness of the uniforms ensures that all students can access well-made, durable clothing, fostering a sense of unity and equality within the college community.

Moreover, the initiative fosters a sense of pride and accomplishment among the students involved in the stitching process. They are not only learning a valuable skill but also contributing to their community, embodying the spirit of self-reliance and entrepreneurship. This experience is poised to enhance their curriculum vitae and provide them with a competitive edge in the job market after graduation.

Wim Colours and Cutting, Knitting Dress Making Centre's initiative is more than just a uniform-stitching project; it is a beacon of innovation in education, showcasing how practical skills can be seamlessly integrated into the academic curriculum. By enabling students to 'earn while you learn', Women's College, Tinsukia, is setting a precedent for other educational institutions to follow.
